Originally bred from wild cats in the Near East approximately 10,000 years ago, domestic cats are now considered a distinct species. As a domesticated animal, cats have no native range and, therefore, are a non-native species in natural systems worldwide. In addition, native prey species often have no evolved defenses against this exotic predator, making the domestic cat a potential threat wherever it is introduced. Explore the ecological impacts of free-roaming cats, discuss the pros and cons of Trap-Neuter-Release programs, and learn about the health risks feral and free-roaming cats can pose to humans and wildlife. Ages: Appropriate for ages 12 and older. Cost: Free!
